Sir,

According to the Asian Development Bank. The region also led the global recovery after the 2009 recession, and its GDP is expected to rise by 6.2 percent in 2014, per the International Monetary Fund (IMF). As the region has modernized and transformed into a global manufacturing hub for multinational corporations, the Asian growth model has been promoted as a development paradigm for emerging paradigm for emerging economies. Yet this model has created a system of vastly unequal outcomes. The workers who have fueled Asia's extraordinary economic growth through their labour in factories and the informal economy, have not shared in economic prosperity—specifically in the form of increased wages, better benefit or secure work. Millions of workers in Asia often risk their lives in unsafe and unhealthy workplaces. Exposed to toxic chemicals or deadly asbestos, in dangerous farm factories or mines, more than 1.1 million people in Asia die each year from workplace hazard or accidents, according to a 2008 International Labour

International Labour Organization (ILO) report. Millions more have been sickened or hurt on the job. Virtually all workers suffering from job-related illness and injury remain undiagnosed, untended and uncompensated. The families of workers who have been killed on the job and those injuries are undiagnosed face impossible hurdles to secure compensation from their governments, employers or the multinational corporations contracting with workers' direct employers. Many, labouring in countries with a lack of democratic space and little recourse to civil society organizations, suffer in silence, unable to improve their working conditions. In the same

In the same case many workers in the coal mines are working their names & address are unknown and Mining 'S' accidents are unreported and request you to kindly save the job safety and health issues, to stop to work in dangerous workplaces, gaining fair compensation when injured or sickened and improving their workplaces to make them safe and healthy for workers
